

By: Kim Foley MacKinnon

Beantown Bites: The Best Places to Eat in Boston

Chowder, lobster rolls and Boston cream pie might be what first come to mind when thinking about Boston's food scene, but Beantown has a whole lot more to serve. World-class chefs, innovative cuisine and an oyster bar on practically every corner (sorry, tacos) take New England's largest city beyond its baked-bean-centric nickname.

Photo By: Nick Calito

22 / 23

French: Deuxave

Deuxave has everything you could want in a French restaurant: a gorgeous setting, well-informed servers and spot-on food. Chef-Owner Chris Coombs opened this contemporary French restaurant in 2010 in the Back Bay to wide acclaim and it's as good as ever. Start with the nine-hour French onion soup (the richness of the broth is worth the intensive prep) and dive into the spiced Long Island duck breast with huckleberry jus, sautéed bulgur and a kale salad. Allow your server to suggest wine pairings — they know what they're talking about here.